I Wrote That Book · picture books from children's own drawings

A teacher at your school is running a picture-book unit. Students draw and write on paper in class. Families who want a printed hardcover use the I Wrote That Book app at home. This page says what the app collects about a child and who sees it.

The app isn't out yet; this is how it works when it opens. Teacher accounts are not open.

What the school handles

- No student accounts and no roster. The teacher creates nothing in the app and uploads no student work.
- Pages go home on paper. A family that wants a hardcover scans the pages at home, under a parent's own account.
- The teacher sees no family data: not the family's account, payment or address.

What the app collects

- About the child: a first name or nickname (letters only), an optional age band (4-5, 6-7 or 8-10) and an avatar from built-in art. Never a last name, birthday, photo of the child, email or password.
- The book: photos of the drawn pages, cropped to the page (the original photo is kept 30 days so a page can be re-cropped), and the words the child adds.
- About the grown-up: their account, and for an order the ship-to name and address. Card details go to the payment processor and never reach our servers.

Who sees it

- The family. Books are private: no public library, no public pages.
- Our team. A real person checks every book before it prints. An automatic check flags captions that look like personal details, such as a last name or a school name, so the parent can change them.
- The printer receives the ship-to name and address and the print files. The cover shows the child's first name, as the book does; nothing about the child is in the files' metadata.
- Nobody else. No ads, no analytics or tracking tools, no third-party SDKs. We don't sell or rent children's information or use it for advertising.

Consent and AI

A parent or guardian gives consent before the app is used for their child, as COPPA requires. "Help me write" suggestions run only when the child asks, are checked for safety before the child sees them, and during our beta run on our own servers, not a third-party AI service.
